A major expansion of a company headquartered in Northern Kentucky will begin next week.

Mazak Corporation has been moving its offices this week in preparation for the beginning of an expansion of its manufacturing facility in Florence.

The Paul Hemmer Company will begin construction on the next phase of the $30 million project next week. Preparation and excavation work began in July.

The two-bay expansion will increase the plant's size by more than 20 percent and allow the machine tool maker to increase its production capacity to 200 machines per month. It is expected to be completed by the end of the year.

Hemmer has long been Mazak's partner in construction and expansion projects. It recently completed a 6,000-square-foot addition to Mazak's manufacturing plant and added a two-story engineering office to the facility. Hemmer also managed two expansion projects at Mazak's Florence campus last year that added more than 30,000 square feet of space.

"Hemmer's design and construction team are involved at the very beginning stages of every Mazak new building, expansion or remodeling project, discussing how the building will be utilized and providing us with ideas and suggestions," Mazak president Brian Papke said in a statement. "Hemmer has successfully managed Mazak's projects to meet our expectations, budgets and completion schedules for a successful partnership."

Mazak employs about 750 people at its Florence campus, which will cover 800,000 square feet when the expansion is complete.
